Com0com [Win/Mac]

com0com is an advanced tool, made up of multiple components. It is a kernel mode driver that manages both the communication between a host application and a target that the host app is connected with and also the virtual com port itself. On the target, com0com actually emulates a serial port and through that software channel can exchange data with the host app. The output in the terminal that com0com presents is to its host app what the physical COM port looks like, so that by exchanging data the apps can communicate with each other. The minimum requirement for using com0com is a host application able to communicate with the target through a serial port and this task is made easier as com0com emulates a physical COM port. However, a successful communication with com0com requires a specific com0com configuration in order to be made available to the target app. How to install com0com: Read the README.txt file that comes with com0com to learn how to install and use com0com. Step by step com0com guide: 1. Download com0com - com0com.zip 2. Extract the com0com.zip archive to some folder 3. Now open the com0com.reg file that is inside the com0com.zip archive to register com0com to your computer. 4. Launch com0com 5. In the com0com.ini file you can specify the virtual com port number. If you are using a port number it will be the default port specified in the com0com.reg file. 6. Launch the application com0com_cucui.exe 7. Open your app and com0com will open on the same computer you connected the host application to com0com. 8. Com0com will emulate a serial port on the virtual com port that we previously specified. 9. You will now be able to ping between the host app and the com0com app. Note: com0com ports can be shared among apps. The way this is accomplished is by using the com0com.ini file to associate the com port number with an app. Hosting providers: please refer to the company's website (read our homepage) for more information. The com0com emulates a serial port on virtual com port, it is recommended to register it with the host application. General
